

Leadership Changes

When a business appoints a new leader, it takes time for the newly appointed executive to understand where the business is regarding strengths and possible weaknesses. The time it takes to fully understand the functional capabilities of the business can lead to a lack of timeous action to address critical problems and to explore immanent opportunities.

The newly appointed CEO can get a full business design report in one session with his Exco members.

The result is a complete report and outline of the strategic position of the business, as well as an operational outline of the company's functional capabilities.

The initial process takes three to five hours, and the reports, recommendations, and project plans are immediately available.
